after contracting in 2009 gdp expanded by 5.9 in latin america and the caribbean in 2010 albeit with the region's hallmark differences in performance from one country to another the expansion in output was driven by strong domestic demand in the forms of both consumption and investment and by buoyant external demand on the domestic demand side private consumption up 5.9 was sustained by an upturn in employment and wages brightening economic expectations an expansion in lending to the private sector and in some countries an upswing in remittances from emigrant workers public consumption rose at a more modest rate of 3.9 and investment jumped by 14.5 with strong growth in the machinery and equipment segments in particular on the external demand side exports of goods and services were especially buoyant rising by over 10 in the southern common market mercosur countries the dominican republic el salvador mexico and nicaragua meanwhile imports of goods and services increased by more than 10 at constant prices on the back of robust domestic demand within the region which rose 7.5
